Equality, noun, means the state of being equal in status, rights and opportunities. This is the definition which equality is most often listed as. But equality means so much more than just having the same rights and opportunities, though that is a big part of equality. Equality means fitting in with the world, it means being able to walk outside with confidence and without being afraid of discrimination. This is the thing that I want in today's society and I'm sure that others also want it. But for equality to happen, we must end hatred and discrimination against minority groups who need it most. [...]

It doesn't matter if you're black, white, Jewish, Muslim, Mexican, African, or transgender. What matters is that we can stop this bullying against the people who need it the most. The problem is that in order for equality to come for all people, especially the teens or children, is to stop that discrimination against them. Most of these people just want to fit in, but we are making it hard for them to do so by hating them and openly discriminating against them. This is what I'm intending to help stop, the open discrimination.
