Injustice is an attack on another person's rights. I cannot say that I have seen injustice in my personal life, but I have seen injustices in the world around me. I believe it is our duty to our fellow human beings to protect each other's rights, remembering that all people, regardless of who they are, what they look like, or what they believe, are valuable members of the human race.

It seems that injustice always stems from a prejudice or fear of some sort. People groups who have power in a society think that they are better than minority people groups with different ethnicities, cultures, beliefs, values, or religions than them, so they naturally treat those different people badly. Others fear people groups who are different than them, somehow feeling threatened by them, so they try to control them. One of the most common ways to mistreat or control a person is to attack their natural rights. In its most basic form, attacking someone's human rights could be seen as abusing power in a way that could almost be compared to bullying. The bully has power over their victim. Usually bullies are stronger or more influential than their victims in some way or form, but power could also be in the form of manipulating the unsuspecting.

I have seen many examples of injustice in the news. Racial injustice is sadly still very real today, not only for black people or African Americans, but also for Hispanic people, people of Asian descent, Native Americans, Native Hawaiians or Pacific Islanders, and people with multiple ethnicities. People of color have a history of being treated unjustly by white or Caucasian people, and although they do not experience the exact same injustices that their ancestors did, these people are often still the targets of systemic racism; that is, they live in societies or countries where the majority of political leaders or government officials are white and there is discrimination in employment, healthcare, criminal justice, and other everyday experiences. That being said, white people or Caucasians are not the only people who have been shown to use their power to cause injustice. In fact, this could not be further from the truth. The fact of the matter is that any group that has a majority presence in a society is capable of using their power to cause injustice.

For example, religious discrimination is a common basis of injustice. Religious discrimination is when one religion treats the members of a specific minority religion badly or when one religion has zero tolerance for any minority religions. Like with racial discrimination, practitioners of these minority religions are often the victims of injustices in employment, politics, and other everyday experiences. Islam is a common example of a victim of religious discrimination and of religiously discriminating against other religions. The majority of the world's超级powers are western societies that were founded by Christians or people whose ancestors practiced Christianity. In the east, however, Islam is a common state religion, especially in the Middle East. In the west, Muslims are often victims of injustice because they are considered the enemy. This not only stems from the historical "war" between Christianity and Islam, but it is also caused by the events in the 20th and early 21st centuries that resulted in western conflicts with the Middle East, especially with terrorist groups. Because western people associate people from the Middle East or whose ancestors were from the Middle East with Islam and terrorism, they are often the victims of injustice: racial, religious, and cultural. It is important to remember that people from the Middle East are not automatically Muslim, Muslims are not automatically terrorists, and terrorists are not automatically Muslims. On the other hand, there are practitioners of minority religions living in societies where Islam is the state religion that experience not only the aforementioned injustices but also religious persecution where practicing their religion could lead to their death.

These are not the only types of injustice that many people all around the world face, but the key to combating injustice is the same for all types. The most basic principle is to treat others how you would want to be treated. This is what I try to do whenever I interact with anyone, regardless of who they are. I would defend the rights of the victims of injustice by spreading awareness about their injustices or participating in movements advocating for change. You don't have to agree with their world view; you just have to help.
